

A little more to say

She just smiles after his Hi, that winter evening,
And indeed the best things in life have the simplest beginning,
Fumbling for words, he knows it's over for the day,
But then, he just finds a little more to say.

Later, one day, gazing into that irresistible smile,
He knows he must confess what he has hidden all these while,
And when he does, in his arms, then wrapped as she lay,
In tears he just finds a little more to say.

He won't forget how she blushed as he stared at her face,
As bizarre as it seems even for him in these days,
Though their eyes say a lot, together as they stay,
Still, he just finds a little more to say.

Then they part to seek their dreams, and he knows it'd be tough
As he worries whether distance will someday wan their love.
But those miles between them never stumble their way,
As he always keeps finding this little more to say.

And the storms that they face, they survive all its kind,
But he knows not there's a thing called change of someone's mind.
And her discarded memories are now those words pale as gray,
All he wishes is to find a little more to say.

And you never know when and how a straight road bends,
Perhaps the best things in life also have the simplest of ends.